

Colours Reflected in Tickets

There are many moving stories about the guidance trips of the respected Comrade Kim Jong Un who devotes himself to the prosperity of his country and the wellbeing of his people.

One spring day, he visited a service building under construction. Expressing satisfaction over the fact that it was fully provided with welfare service facilities, he learned in detail about its construction.

When he stood in the middle of a terraced auditorium which was yet to be completed, an official pointed at five chairs temporarily installed in each section there.

Red seats were seen in the middle section, and blue or green ones in other sections.

Officials felt satisfied as they thought that the auditorium would look nice when its sections would be installed with seats in different colours.

After carefully looking at the chairs in each section, Kim Jong Un said he had seen seats in different colours in a gymnasium. Praising the officials for following suit, he fell into a thought for a while and continued that it would be convenient for the audience to find the seats if their tickets had the same colour of their seats.

The officials were struck with admiration, as they had never thought of making the tickets in the same colour as the seats so as to ensure the convenience of the audience.

Listening to what he had to say, they realized that the starting point of all ideas and creation is the convenience and interests of people and that creation is of no significance apart from them.
